US Intent to Withdraw from Paris Agreement no excuse for delays in South Africa

After the anouncement of Trump

Paris Washington DC, 02.06.2017, 21:29 Time

USPA NEWS - The US withdrawing from the Paris agreement will delay the transition and could lead to temperatures peaking at higher levels, with concurrent climate change impacts on millions of people. President Donald Trump announced last night that he would begin the process of withdrawing the United States from the historic Paris Agreement, the world's first global plan to address climate change.

President Donald Trump announced last night that he would begin the process of withdrawing the United States from the historic Paris Agreement, the world's first global plan to address climate change.

The historic agreement, approved in December 2015, commits nearly 200 countries to pursue all efforts to limit global temperature increase to 1.5 °C to stave off some of the worst impacts of a warming planet.

Even in a developing country like South Africa it is becoming clear that the transition to a low carbon society is inevitable. Shifts in international geopolitics will only determine the pace of that transition and at what level temperatures will peak.

"Fortunately, the Paris Agreement is bigger than any one nation or any one government. We can still achieve the promise of Paris, but we have no time to lose. Countries around the world must seize the opportunity to unleash this potential, invest in renewable energy that eliminates harmful carbon pollution, and build economies that are more resilient, inclusive and prosperous."
